Program #7

1969

Oliver Everette reads part of the God has been northward always sequence after he reads a section from Studies in black. There is a connection between the two pieces. The Old violin poem is concerned with his father who died when he was a child. His father had many problems. He was trying to make a living off of a brush farm. He was committed to an asylum and died there shortly afterwards. He was of Viking stock. Professor Everette would often think about his father playing his violin.
